Abstract

Most aboriginal lives revolve around depending on their families, but they are regretting showing their families the importance as they have been ignored from later on. The blood bond and sibling abuse went from hand to hand. Changing the narratives of the story only made it worse, as either the children were taken away from the family or killed due to the trauma caused by the whites of that time. Slowly introducing them to the world did not work in the finest ways. Knowing they have no future, no life, they still wanted to strive hard on the outside without any hardships. But later on when the whites started to move out and the community was left helpless because they thought they would be carrying their children on the ship of freedom. Turned into reality, the white supremacist left everyone behind and took only the stolen children to keep them as their slaves.

No apology was given, later on when the people started to talk about it and the grown children realised what they are going through and wanted to tell the world about the situation that their entire life was put into. Once authors like Sally Morgan and Marlee Silva started to publish the book worldwide. The horrendous stories were called fake by the whites even in recent times, later on The Government of Australia issued a public apology for the community. The importance of keeping everyone safe and close has been through all the essays.

INTRODUCTION:

All of the aboriginal stories revolve around families, irrespective of who the author or poet is, the whole conversation happens around. Strong characters like Daisy and Annie from Australian literature give us a heap of happiness. They went through everything from getting kidnapped to raising their own. Being sent to institutional places were the worst of everything, considering they had to cut off their hair, converse in english and convert to Christianity. Leaving the family gives everyone a different kind of pain but changing the names and converting into different religions gives them a sense of foreign. Entire identity of the individual is taken away, they don't feel like themselves anymore. Taking all these away from them is equal to removing their sense of identity which in return will make them weak mentally.

OBJECTIVE:

While writing about the families of those who have gone through so much in the name of slavery, too many questions arise and why the government hasn't responded properly for all of these. The forced removal of 17,000 children has never affected anyone outside the culture, irrespective of how many cases that were put forward only the No.2 Mabo case walked out the court. The Mabo.V.Queensland was created to pull and conquer the attention of the ruling government. During the 1970's the cases of missing children came down, gradually the child protection policies were taken down for this community, the most talked about 1915 amendments to the Aborigines Protection Act 1909. Such powerful acts under the people who are thirsty for blood. The Aboriginal Heritage Act was again laid to protect the people and the land without any forced police involvement. The Aborigines Act of 1911 instead of protecting the people they got the right to remove them first natives from their families. Slaving was emerging all over the Eden's land, the helpless nature dependent people hugely relied on nature to protect them, when the European settlers came in with huge firearms they knew they had lost the war.

Proceeding with knowing and understand the importance of family, during this period of time they always kept everyone safe inside their families except for their first borns, who were forcefully removed. The parents had no other way other than letting the kids go, any form of opposing will lead them to death penalty on spot. When the stolen children grow into adults they realise what has happened to them, they don't know their actual names or their family history, they are are just piece of flesh that can move around. Once finding the family that they live with is not their actual parents these children undergo a huge mental flip, at the age of fourteen or fifteen they find out an unacceptable truth about their families, realisation does not hit them till they are full grown adults. On the effect they keep wondering and may even go in search of their real parents who might have been killed a long time ago by the Britishers. Returning to their lands just to hear words like you look like your mother your voice has similar tone like your father are some of the sentences that broke their hearts. Undergoing all of these just opened a different door for them, understanding the importance of siblings and other non-blood related members.

After effects were fully blown under the government policies, once the children are no more children they are pushed into the community to become servants and maids for the whites. It never stopped, they were used to handle hot tar for laying roads. Denying the education for them and making them cook and toil hard on the farm lands. The scorching heat waves and lack of nutrition killed half of the population. Watching their children, sibling die took a leap on their mental health. The Resistance and Race was going from hand to hand without anyone's knowledge. Children being the innocent minds followed each and every word that was forced on them, without understanding the consequences that they were signing up for, the laws never favoured them.

In-return they were joyed as it was all free labour and no food issues as they were used to starvation. But not all whites behaved this way, some were down to earth providing everything they could for the blacks, they even named them "Blokes" being fair on the side of the natives, the land belonged to them. The visitors overstayed and took their property and made sure they didn't get anything out of it.

IMPORTANCE:

Annie from Sister heart knew better than anyone how to handle the crowd threat that stole her, she was scared to let her feelings outside due to the reason of being killed in the first place. Her name was changed and her hair was cut, she was thrown in a ship and kidnapped at a very young age, pushed her to a different place exactly the opposite direction of her home. The sea water and salt became her slow friends in her journey. She cried for her days to be over, respectfully she was not treated well in the institution, she figured her way. She saw two children whom she got reminded of at home and made them as her siblings, little does she know they both are going to change her life entirely, the way she cared for them, took the issues into her hands. From yearning for her mother to becoming one for the children of her own age, she has come a long way in it. The same events happened everyday, she tried to escape the zone and almost drowned into the sea. The north to south escape trick was not favourable for her, she felt unrecognised under the circumstances, she felt out of home, the essence of love at that age was not seen anywhere. Under major situations, she threw fit and was badly beaten up by the nuns who ran the place. Throwing children into dark alleys and not feeding them throughout was major punishments given in the place. Converting them into "True Christians" was the only goal followed by the people of that place, the government was fully charged to turn the people as one of them and keep them as their slaves. The Australian Natives had to run a bit far to save themselves, which always ended up in vain. The Crown was cruelly charging taxes for the public, the wars started to break loose ties on both ends, the powerful, fully packed machinery killed more people than they ever could have imagined in their wildest dreams. The children were lost, they had no idea that their parents were dead, they could not even see their flesh and bones at this stage.

Daisy from "My Place" luckily became the servant in the wealthy family, her bad fortune she ended up having a child with the rich white crown. She hid the fact for decades together until her brother opened up and Sally dragged the story by travelling to the next continent. If her goal was protecting her daughter and wanting to give her a safe space to grow. She definitely succeeded in it, making use of the privilege, she made the father figure as her daughter's uncle and never opened up throughout the life, she had a long back story and secret. Hiding who the father just for the protection of the child is wild, she grew up having an absent father, but he was around watching her grow into a beautiful woman, circumstances change people accordingly, flexing on what we have and gaining the humongous amount of love from single parent is the most difficult thing, still Daisy proved her daughter that she is right and what a single parent can do, just to protect the child. If Daisy did not take this one step, she could have lost the child to the Europeans, she knew their true colour, as she was separated from her family and became their slave, she wanted none for her family to go through the difficult relationship, she wanted to mend it and have a generous loving prosperous family. Healing her own soul and breaking generational trauma is not easy, she was the only person who can speak the native language, her love for it grew beyond grace and now her grandchildren converse with her in it. She was proud of the woman she became and proud of the woman her daughter has become because of her.

Irrespective of woman fighting just to save their children and give them a decent life even without the help of their children, the refusal and ignorance going around from the time of humanity raised to till now. No one has ever changed their misogynist views on woman. Their protests just to save their children has been silenced, long term wars and internal violence has turned men into monsters who kill their own spouses. Lack of education on importance of how children should be brought up in a happy family to create happy home, a safe place where the child knows the worth of themselves and the worth of protecting the family that they are striving for. Once the men of the same house understand the importance of their other half and decide to grow together and raise the child together, this will be stopped. Stealing new born infants when they just saw the world and abducting them when the mother is still healing has to be the lowest anyone can go, either they were too scared of getting killed or their power over the place has been lost, the government has always ruined the better days for the natives, being too scared has costed them of being childless, the power over female infants as they become the best servants has always topped the list of the official stealing list.

The Government of Australia has always paved a special way for justifying their tantrums, the people of the land drench their children in coal and hide them in dark places as the teenagers were their major target for developing the nation with free of cost. Every time when police siren alerts the people scare and run for their lives to protect their children, teenagers have hide in pockets of soil for weeks together, plenty of woman have hid their pregnancies and died while giving birth just for the sake of protecting a new born. Years later slowly the stories creeped into the minds of general public and the Britishers left the nation, they also snuck in the natives in the barrels and tossed them in the trunk of the ship, commanding they stole the people and made them slaves in The Great Britain. The natives stuck in new land with no homes and food and was put up for trade, humans buying humans was made legal. As immoral as it sounds, this has happened and no one came forward to stop this blasphemy, the right to vote and enslavement was continuing for hundred plus years and the jog of the Britishers also continued in several other continents in the name of trade. The entire African continent was ruined, the wealth was looted along with the people, they used people instead of animals for farming. Instead of taxing the rich they started taxing the slaves by taking the food of the plate giving them more work than what human force could do. All the greater monuments we see today are dig up and straight out of the labour of the natives. British referring them as slaves is considered as Socialist standard at their times, killing people was the most, dead down they could steep. Narrating all the incidents might seem bit off, saying the truth always stands a chance to deal with the arrogant behaviour laid on them.

CONCLUSION:

The White Suprematist always had their own way of changing the rules and flexible way for putting people behind the bars. They also had their own ways of committing crimes and escaping from the rules. This has always made the life of the Natives a living hell to live through. No one wants to get mistreated that way, the whites did. They ruled and owned the lands, spread fake disease and killed the people by refusing the opportunity of giving treatment. One way or other they always found immense joy in hurting others. The big war guns and fires, they played with hundreds and thousands of families. They wrecked lives and took pride in it. Not treating another human as human broke the humanity in them, they found it hard to identify the difference between animals and humans.
